CCMDoc25 February 2011, 23:09*Terminal Bullet Performance

Remember,

keep track of which barrel each bullet is fired from. One barrel has a perfectly good and properly squared crown and the other has a bit of "offset".

One question to be answered is whether this offset crown work contributes to additional yaw and tumbling.

Doc

Yep, I got it--In fact I unpacked the rifle this morning, and very very briefly looked at the offset crown and looks a bit like an egg. For sure will document and take a lot of time with it, and save the solids for all the terminals. I can do my sighting with the NonCons--since the NonCons don't shear anyway. Also will use a few more witness cards than normal too. It will be a good test I am sure.

I am very very tempted to put that rail to use that you sent down in that case!!!! But would never do so! HEH----scope that bad boy up and get some real accuracy at 50! HEH HEH.....

Michael,

Go ahead and scope it - I've been considering it anyway - then we'll really see what it can do. Take some photos with it mounted before taking your scope off so I can make a decision one way or the other.

CCMDoc,

You are mighty brave! Better hope Michael doesn't need a hammer when he's mounting that scope! As much as I hate to see a scope on a SXS double I do think it is OK when testing these guns and bullets. My eyes are going and so is my shoulder after all these tests. A scope will really help.

Michael,

Sorry I had to!

Remember putting a scope on a double may change regulation. We might need to shoot a few with irons first before mounting the scope. This will at least let us know how much difference there will be.

Look here, I think I will just quickly get a set of dies and shell holder from Midway--Will have it by Monday, tuesday latest, this will work into the test schedule very well, I have a few hundred .409s I can burn so that is not an issue. If you don't mind giving me the exact load you are using and if you don't mind me loading for your rifle, then I would just as soon do it that way, no fuss with sending and shipping and waiting and so forth! It's really a hard choice. In many ways I do like the 50 B&M better for some things. I have used it a hell of a lot, and it's always the hammer. What it lacks in velocity over say 458 Lott--it makes up in diameter for sure. Capable of the CEB #13s 500 gr at 2150--460 CEB NonCon at over 2250 fps, I believe it is getting even better with that combo. Now, the 450 North Fork FPS and CPS combo at over 2300 fps is really enhancing the 50 B&M and it's 18 inch barrel, and 38 inches OAL.

I have used my 458 B&M the least I guess in the field, it did a fine job on buffalo in Australia, just could not ask for better. But I have done a hell of a lot of field work with 458 Winchester and 458 Lott too, so I am very familiar with 458. The .500s had more to prove--to me, and getting proper bullets for what I needed to do with .500 caliber, which required lot's of field work to go with the test work, so I have worked more with .500 over the last few years.

But nearly all this can also be done in the 18 Inch 458 B&M also--with the exception of diameter. Maybe more bullet choices and more cheaper bullets available in 458. But I have pushed .500 caliber now that we have some extreme bullets available, and coming is a 450 gr North Fork SS Bonded Premium! For serious go to work in the field bullets, everything is there for .500 for sure. I like both--but if I had only one to go to the field I suppose it would be the 50. I would not be under gunned either with the 458 B&M and both rifles are the same size!

Why yes, in fact just this week I received a new test rifle in which I might be able to learn more about those cussed double barrel things ya'll play with! Hard enough getting one barrel to shoot, much less two!

Light? Sometimes when I drink too much sake the light gets too bright, have to close my eyes then! HE HEh.....

Well, anyway, I have done some enhancements to the sight system for the test work part of this. I tell you I had to mix up a whole lot of that JB Weld to get this thing put on this rifle, stuff just squirts out everywhere in the process. I still may have to get out a roll of that duct tape to hold the scope in place??? Not sure yet, will see if the JB Weld Holds good and tight? Hope all that extra JB weld didn't get in the action when I was dropping it all over the place???

Oh ok from the photos looks like I did a good job with the bastard file getting that JB Weld off the side of it! Whew.....

Question to Doctari:

In your book The Perfect Shot, you state that hemispherical solids penetrate better than flat-nosed solids. However, in one of your recent Sports Afield columns, you stated that flat-nosed solids penetrate best. Which is it?

Answer:

The Perfect Shot was written almost ten years ago. At that time we all thought hemispherical round-nosed solids were the best penetrators, simply because there were few flat-nosed solids available in those days with which to compare them. Things are different today. Flat-nosed solids, we now know, are by far the best for penetration. This is why most manufacturers now offer them. And, more importantly, they also create a larger permanent wound channel, which appears to be about 2/3 of caliber in size. And they also appear to visibly "hit" harder. I have in my photo collection a photo of a large elephant cow that was shot from the rear with a South African-made 410-grain flat-nosed .416 Rigby solid called a Dzombo. The bullet entry wound is just to the side of the spine, and it was recovered in one of the tusks! Total penetration length was 23 feet! I now use these photos in my ballistic lectures. (The cow was shot on problem animal control here in South Africa.) It is thought that the reason why flat-nosed solids penetrate better in bodily tissue is because of what is known as the Vapor Bubble Theory. Such a nose shape creates a shock wave that surrounds the bullet as it passes through the fluid-rich medium of bodily tissue. The flatter the nose, the greater the wave, which displaces bodily tissue sideways. This creates a "bubble" in which the bullet then travels. There is obviously less resistance on the bullet while in the bubble, so it penetrates farther.

I am in the process of updating The Perfect Shot for reasons like this.
